One night? Feels like three years... Jacob Donnelly wants something new. Something different. Which is why he's got a one-way ticket to New York and his bags packed. One last night out to the bar finds him in a sexy stranger's bed, giving in to an explosive chemistry Jacob had been searching for, but never found. Until now. It's too bad he's leaving town, although once he finds out his one night stand's true identity, Jacob can't get away fast enough.

Cash Warner made a mistake. It doesn't matter that he'd never felt anything like the fire generated between him and Jacob. He doesn't plan to ever see his one-night hookup ever again. Except he does. When the reality of what they'd done fully sets in, Jacob flees, leaving Cash struggling with how to deal with the bitter taste of betrayal he can't escape. Because even with Jacob gone for years, Cash can't stop wanting more of that one night. Fate conspires against them once again, bringing Jacob home after tragedy strikes, and they'll find it near impossible to keep their distance despite being committed to other people.
